二桃杀三士 [èr táo shā sān shì] to kill three valiants by offering them two peaches as reward — Master Yan (the spring and Autumn period, B. C. 770-476) hurried past Gongsun Jie, Tian Kaijing and Master Gu Ye, who were in the service of Duke Jing and known as tiger-catchers for bravery and strength. None of them rose. "Lords of repute, we are told," he said in audience with the Duke, "are able to forbid domestic violence and awe the foreign foe by expecting from the brave and strong gentlemen in their service respect for rightful sovereignty and the conventions of rank, elevating and rewarding those whose services have deserved as much from their masters by bravery redoubtable to their inferiors. Your Grace, who expects neither of these things, fails on both counts and would be best advised to rid himself of a faculty which threatens the land."
"Hands, I daresay," said the Duke, "could not be laid on them, nor daggers bite."
"They know," said the Master, "more about a strong attack on a powerful foe than about the due order of seniority." And he requested the Duke to make them the scant present of two peaches, with a message saying. "You may consume these according to your merits."
"Master Yan is a clever one!" exclaimed Gongsun Jie to the heavens. "He is trying to make His Grace reckon our merits, as we must do to have the peaches, for they are fewer than we, and to refuse them would be cowardice. My first merit was to catch a grown boar and my second a tiger cub, deeds which entitle me to a peach more than another man." And he took one and rose up.
"I," said Tian Kaijing, "repulsed three armies at the head of my men, twice: deeds which entitle me too to a peach more than another man." And he took one and rose up.
"Once," said Master Gu Ye, "I was fording the Yellow River with my Lord when a turtle fastened on the near trace horse, taking it into midstream by Dizhu Island, I was young then and could not swim, so I walked underwater a hundred paces upstream and three leagues downstream, found the turtle and killed it. When I leapt out like a crane with the horse's tail in my left hand and the turtle's head in my right, those at the crossing said, 'It is the river god! See the great turtle's head he has!' This deed entitles me to a peach more than any. Put both yours back, draw your swords and stand!"
"You better us in deeds," said the others, "as you pass us in courage. It was greed not to yield the peaches and would be cowardice not to die." And both put back their peaches, slit their throats and died.
"It would be callous to live for what they have died for," said Master Gu Ye, "and unjust to boast of having shamed men with words. Cowardly the regret that lives on! If only they had shared one peach between them and left the other to me!" And he too put back the peaches, slit his throat and died.
The messenger returned with word of their death. The Duke had them laid dressed in their coffins and interred with the rights of gentlemen. ‖ to kill somebody by underhand tricks/by schemes and plots
